You pick the video platform. Meet Rediculous. 1. CMD+R 2. Shortcut: Command+R . Shortcut: Command+R You may be thinking "who cares about keyboard shortcuts" or "I don't even have to use my mouse to look up my favorite video" or "I'll never forget the time I did this". If you're like me, you've used a Mac for a long time. This means you've memorized lots of keyboard shortcuts. The reality is, Mac users like me memorize shortcuts because they are incredibly useful. Back in my day, shortcuts were for quick use. When I was using a Mac, I used the arrow keys to scroll down, up, left, and right. That's what I was trained to do. Today, the arrow keys can be used for anything from volume control to selecting the next or previous slide in a presentation. Now I use shortcuts like Command+R to look up my videos on YouTube. The problem is, Command+R is no longer a shortcut. It's a joke. I'm not the only one who has a hard time remembering the shortcut. In fact, many Mac users have a hard time remembering any shortcut, even those that are classic (see what I did there?). I'm not sure what the problem is. Perhaps it's because everyone is so dependent on technology that we have lost the knack for remembering shortcuts. Whatever it is, I'm here to remind you: there are shortcuts for everything. You can take shortcuts to look up videos on YouTube, look up a video on Vimeo, or look up all of the links in an e-mail. You can take shortcuts to look up the weather, find your next coffee, and much more. Here are some more common shortcuts that you might not know about.
